PASSERIFORMES	Tyrannidae	Tyrant-flycatchers	Fluvicolinae	Fluvicolini	Chapada Flycatcher	Guyramemua affinis	(Burmeister, 1856)	R	NT	Suiriri affinis , Suiriri islerorum	Chapada Suiriri	Lopes et al. (2018) established a new genus for the species following confirmation that it is more closely related to Sublegatus than to Suiriri suiriri , and that there are significant and consistent differences from the three members of Sublegatus . Hence the proposed new genus Guyramemua Lopes, et al., 2018 is accepted by the BirdLife Taxonomic Working Group, hence Suiriri affinis (del Hoyo and Collar 2016) becomes Guyramemua affinis (HBW and BirdLife International (2019)). Previously Suiriri affinis (del Hoyo and Collar 2016) was newly described as Suiriri islerorum by Zimmer et al. (2001). However the type specimen of S. affinis previously believed to belong to S. suiriri was subsequently shown to relate to this species, and takes precedence (Kirwan et al. 2014).	del Hoyo, J., Collar, N.J., Christie, D.A., Elliott, A., Fishpool, L.D.C., Boesman, P. and Kirwan, G.M. 2016. PASSERIFORMES	Maluridae	Fairy-wrens	Malurinae		Purple-backed Fairy-wren	Malurus assimilis	North, 1901	R	LC		Variegated Fairywren	Malurus lamberti has been split into Variegated Fairy-wren M. lamberti (monotypic) and Purple-backed Fairy-wren M. assimilis (with races rogersi, dulcis and bernieri) following the proposal by McLean et al. (2017) upon finding that the two forms occur in close proximity with very little hybridisation along the Great Dividing Range. Using information from the paper, it appears that M. lamberti separates from M. assimilis and other subspecies by its; much paler, brighter shade of (different) blues on crown, ear-coverts and mantle (score = 3); extensive fawn-grey vs reduced fawn-grey to pale cinnamon flanks (1); longer tail (no raw data given, but at least 1); and either parapatric distribution (score 3) or very narrow hybrid zone (2, latter preferred on the evidence provided). PASSERIFORMES	Vireonidae	Vireos			Red-eyed Vireo	Vireo olivaceus	(Linnaeus, 1766)	R	LC			Vireo olivaceus (del Hoyo and Collar 2014) has been split into Red-eyed Vireo V. olivaceus and Chivi Vireo V. chivi, as previously adopted by Stotz et al. (1996). Battey and Klicka (2017) strengthen this case on the basis of complete genetic separation and entirely antithetical patterns of movement but make no attempt to consider morphological characters. Boesman (2016) provides further support via finding that there is an extreme likelihood that there are consistent differences between the songs, (allowing a score of 4), plus chivi has a dark brown versus ruby red iris (3) and the different migratory habits (maximum permitted score 1). Consequently, Chivi Vireo V. chivi is accorded species status.	Handbook of the Birds of the World and BirdLife International. 2019. PASSERIFORMES	Remizidae	Penduline-tits			Eurasian Penduline-tit	Remiz pendulinus	(Linnaeus, 1758)	R	LC			Remiz macronyx has been lumped with Eurasian Penduline-tit R. pendulinus, after detailed molecular analysis (Barani-Beiranvand et al. 2017) suggested that there is very little difference between the forms and that R. pendulinus/macronyx, R. coronatus and R. consobrinus form three independent evolutionary lineages. Further support for the two superficially distinctive types actually belonging to a single species can be found in the taxonomic notes in the Checklist, which mention taxa (postarjogi, koutoni and altaicus) now known to be hybrids between the two species, while R. m. ssaposhnikovi is so variable that it, too, is probably better considered a hybrid, and the race R. p. caspius is admitted as possibly better belonging with R. macronyx. Such taxonomic uncertainty suggests a boundary between the two species so porous that the only reasonable course is to treat them as one. PASSERIFORMES	Pycnonotidae	Bulbuls			Cream-eyed Bulbul	Pycnonotus pseudosimplex	Shakya et al., 2019	R	LC			Pycnonotus simplex has been split into Cream-vented Bulbul P. simplex and Cream-eyed Bulbul P. pseudosimplex after Shakya et al. (2019) discovered that white-eyed birds on Borneo hitherto considered variants of red-eyed P. simplex are genetically distinct and more closely related to Ashy-fronted Bulbul P. cinereifrons of Palawan, while Bornean P. simplex are sister to white-eyed P. simplex of the Thai-Malay Peninsula. Since they are sympatric with red-eyed birds, white-eyed Bornean birds must constitute a species, P. pseudosimplex. Apart from the molecular difference the new form differs by its iris colour (score 3), 'in being yellower on the throat and vent, creating greater contrast with the darker breast and flanks' (1), and in seemingly small morphometric characters, with a shorter, shallower billâ€ when data on males (the paper does not discriminate by sex) are compared, P. pseudosimplex has a mean bill depth of 4.06 SD 0.31 (n=7) vs 4.66 SD 0.23 (n=5) resulting in an effect size of 3.2 (score 2). PASSERIFORMES	Zosteropidae	White-eyes and yuhinas			Sangkar White-eye	Zosterops melanurus	Hartlaub, 1865	R	VU			Oriental White-eye Zosterops palpebrosus has been split into Indian White-eye Z. palpebrosus, Hume's White-eye Z. auriventer and Sangkar White-eye Z. melanurus on the basis of thorough morphological comparisons (Wells et al. 2017a, b) and genetic differentiation, morphology and vocalisations (Round et al. 2017, Lim et al. 2019). The subspecies Z. m. melanurus is here cautiously treated in line with Lim et al. (2019), who conclude: 'photographic evidence of populations in montane Sumatra strongly suggests the presence of a population of the montane species Hume's White-eye, Zosterops auriventer & that has hitherto been misidentified (unpublished data), and we follow this preliminary evidence here in excluding montane Sumatran populations from the range of buxtoni.
